Former CIA Official Collapses After Boat Wins Potomac Race

George A. Carver Jr., an analyst of international affairs and a former CIA official, had an apparent heart attack yesterday after serving as coxswain of a boat representing former students of Oxford University in a crew race on the Potomac River.

Carver was taken from the Potomac Boat Club to George Washington University medical center, where he was listed in critical condition in a coronary care unit.

Carver's Oxford crew defeated oarsmen representing Cambridge University alumni in the race, spectators said. They said Carver collapsed after climbing from the winning boat.

A senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, Carver, 56, is a former deputy to the director of central intelligence for national intelligence.
